

ABSTRACT

[0091] A method and apparatus for non-destructive testing of a structure including the deposition of energy volumetrically into an object and detecting transient temperatures at a surface of the object caused by diffusion of the deposited energy. The energy is typically induced within the object by an induction coil and viewed by an IR camera as the transient energy exits the surface of the object.